The exhibition Columbus City Hall: Center for Civic Inspiration explores the architect’s design intent and the public art program that have helped make Columbus City Hall a center for civic inspiration. Designed by architect Charles Bassett who worked in the San Francisco branch office of Skidmore, Owings & Merrill, Columbus City Hall was completed in 1981. Bassett sought to create a space that serves as a metaphor for democracy and community involvement. For Bassett, nearly every decision about the building’s design worked to achieve this lofty goal.

Columbus City Hall has been awarded two design awards: the California Council American Institute of Architects’ Design Award in 1989 and AIA Indiana’s 25-Year Design Award in 2014.
